Roulette

Roulette Betting & Play Procedures

-After the previous decision, the dealer announces, "The Table is Open..." Players can place as many bets as they wish, in accordance with the options offered by the lay down, as illustrated and explained on the betting chart.

-The dealer starts the wheel spinning in one direction, and then "throws" the ball (with some force) in the opposite direction, along the black rail of the bowl.

-As the wheel begins to slow, the dealer calls out "No More Bets." Gravity and decreasing momentum begin to affect the ball, and it starts its descent into the bowl. It strikes the baffles and partitions, with unpredictable changes in directions. It often hovers above several numbers, and sometimes lands in one number, only to bounce out and continue on its way. Eventually, it comes to rest on the winning number.

-The dealer announces the number, places a Winning Number Indicator on it, and rakes off the losing bets.

-The winning bets are paid. The winning wagers are NOT removed from the lay down, unless requested by the player. He can remove them himself, if desired, or ask the dealer to do so. If nothing is said, the bets are left to ride on the next spin.

-Winners are paid proper amounts, in accordance with the Standard Roulette Pay-Out Chart

-A single number win pays 35 to 1. A $1 chip is paid with two stacks of chips. One stack of 20, and the second of 15. This is not just a casino custom, it is standard dealer procedure, with sound business-like logic. Monte Carlo dealers should always use the 20 chip stack system, just like casino dealers.

The Zero & Double Zero

These numbers are normally considered to be house numbers. Some people think that the house wins all bets if the ball lands in either "0 or 00". This is NOT the case. Players can bet on these specific numbers, the same as any others on the betting layout. Bets can also be made, combining these with their adjacent numbers of 1, 2, & 3.

With the exception of the bets described, the zero and double zero ARE winning decisions for the house.
